Restriction-Modification systems are pervasive across bacteria and represent a textbook example of a non-adaptive immune system, also referred to as immigration control. By using the classic EcoRI and EcoRV, we revisit the biology of Restriction-Modification systems at the single-cell level in search for the cost of such immigration control.